In 2013, the American College of Prosthodontists Education Foundation's Highest Honor -- The ACPEF Founders Society Award -- was presented to Dr. Brackett, recognizing her contributions as a philanthropist "raised to give back," and she knows the value to society of inspiring young dentists to pursue advanced training to become dental specialists. As a board-certified Prosthodontist, Dr. Brackett understands this firsthand as she put herself through dental school and residency to improve patient outcomes and continues to give back today.

"I am excited by my vision of continuing service to the College and working to fulfill the goals and mission of our specialty organization," Dr. Brackett said. "With my experience dealing with diverse groups and building consensus within committees and task forces, I look forward to serving as the American College of Prosthodontists vice president."

Dr. Brackett will be the third female to ascend to president of the American College of Prosthodontists in 2016-17.
